THE REAL ESTATE REPORT

WHAT FALL MEANS FOR OKANAGAN'S VACATION PROPERTY MARKET

Here's how you can take advantage of this strategic season

With the end of the vibrant summer tourism season in the Okanagan, the vacation property market experiences notable shifts into the fall. This time of year presents unique opportunities and challenges for both buyers and sellers. It is a period of adjustment, with slower demand, motivated sellers, and opportunities for strategic buyers to find good deals before the winter sets in.

Slow down

During summer, the Okanagan is a hotspot for tourists, with its picturesque lakes, wineries, and outdoor activities. Many vacation homes are in high demand during these peak months, especially those located near the region's popular lakes such as Okanagan Lake, Skaha Lake, and Kalamalka Lake. However, as autumn sets in and the weather cools, fewer tourists are visiting the area, and this decrease in demand affects the vacation property market.

Serious shoppers

For sellers, fall can be a time to appeal to buyers looking for off-season deals.

Buyers shopping in this season are more likely to be serious, rather than just the lookey-loos that come to the Okanagan as tourists.

Savings

With fewer people in the market, buyers can often negotiate more favourable prices, making fall an attractive time for investment. Additionally, sellers who may have had difficulty selling during the busy summer months could be more motivated to make deals before winter. This leads to more flexibility in negotiations, often resulting in properties being sold at slightly lower prices than during the summer peak.

Strategic savvy

For buyers, fall offers the advantage of less competition, which means more time to make decisions without the pressure of a fast-moving market. They can also use this season to get better insight into year-round maintenance needs and potential challenges that come with owning a vacation property in the region's cooler months.
